The NZ Herald calls Roderick Deane 'the godfather of New Zealand commerce'. He has had a bigger impact on NZ's economic revolution of the past two decades than any person other than Roger Douglas. As deputy-governor of the Reserve Bank he was at the very heart of the dramatic introduction of Rogernomics. As head of the State Services Commission, Deane oversaw the selling of the 'family silver' - the break-up of the public service. In the past twenty years only Roger Douglas has played a bigger role in reshaping the NZ economy. And the remarkable thing is that Deane has always been a public servant and then a businessman - never an elected politician. This biography provides a fascinating picture of political and economic life behind the scenes during some of NZ's most tumultuous times, and contains genuine fireworks. The saga of Muldoon behaving atrociously during the handover of power to the Lange government in 1984, for example, is described in fascinating detail.

Find out where you don't need to spend money, as well as how to make a limited budget really count --

As a result of Deng Xiaoping's reform initiatives, the austere and colorless collectivism of the Maoist era was supplanted by an upscale entrepreneurial ethos labeled "socialism with Chinese characteristics." For some Chinese this meant new and unprecedented opportunities for upward mobility; for others it meant rising personal vulnerability and marginalization. Today, a scant two decades after Mao's death, few traces of the Chairman's essential zeitgeist remain. Maoism, the spartan, puritanical credo fashioned by a small band of dedicated revolutionaries in the 1930s and 1940s, is moribund. - Preface.
